A Fact. and Its Consequences

consideration of the great politico-economic question of the relation of capr tal and labor, etc., one great fact and its consequences are strangely overlooked. It appears to be generally accepted as an axiom that "money is merely the medium of exchange." In a certain sense and to a certain extent that is true; but it is not the complete

The great fact referred to is this, that so far as concerns the consideration of the relations of capital, there are two classes of people in the country: 1st, those whose only capital is their mental the parlor table and a piece in the li- land or its products, or in machinery, or equivalent; and 2d, those whose capie tal is actual coin or its equivalent.

To the first class, money is, as the current phrase says, merely or mainly first and when I asked where pa was, a medium of exchange. When prices go up at one end of their business they u-ually go down at the other, so that the comparative value of money don't make very great difference to them. For illustration it might be mentioned that the day laborer don't care whether dollars a day, provided the one dollar will buy, at the time when he gets it, as much of the necessaries of life for the house that smelled so, as well as the he gets them -and this is very frequently the case.

But the second class of people, thos whose capital is money or its equivalent, view this matter from a very difmore than a mere medium of exchange sent for plumbers, and ma went out to for them. Whatever tends to make money higher in relation to other things adds so much to their actual wealth floor in the basement, I came over here and eice eersa. And there are already so many of this class of people in the daims about as many.
